Approximately 30 physicians, 90 nurses, and several dentists and physician assistants have responded in the past six years since health-care professionals were first called to serve as medical advisors to mission presidents and area presidencies. They have encountered many challenges, have become familiar with untold health problems, and have done a marvelous job to keep our missionaries healthy. □ Several have served in the United States. Most have gone to Third World countries. Their reports, as they have returned, have been so faith promoting and inspiring. We are pleased to read in this issue the experiences of five physicians who recently returned home. Their stories speak for themselves and give you a clear idea of the opportunities that await you if you desire to get involved. □ The General Authorities have expressed their appreciation for those who are willing to help in such a worthy cause. They recognize that we have special skills that are so badly needed. Now fewer missionaries are returning home with significant persistent illnesses. Parents have been most grateful for what the Church is doing to assist these young people. □ As you approach your retirement, you too could become involved in this most worthy effort. Consider it and prepare yourselves. It is so rewarding and at the same time so needed. □ Quinton S. Harris, M.D. □ Chairman, Medical Advisory Committee of the Missionary Department
